Graffiti is also an unexpected expense for property owners who must paint over the tags within 48 hours of reporting them.

"It's never just one building that's tagged. It's six or eight structures," said Kim Heim of MainStreet Oceanside, the city's downtown business association. "It's pure chance and randomness who gets tagged and who doesn't, and it's an expense you can't budget for."

To keep track of graffiti vandals and where they are tagging, police have begun using a Web-based program from Graffiti Tracker that uses GPS and photos to map and document taggers' activities. Experts at Graffiti Tracker analyze new graffiti each time a photo is downloaded into the database.

The Escondido Police Department in 2006 was the first local agency to try Graffiti Tracker.

The county Sheriff's Department and Oceanside police contracted with the company this year.

"We've certainly seen an increase in the quality of cases," said sheriff's Cmdr. Ed Prendergast, who hopes to have the entire county using the program someday. "We are focusing on those folks who are the most prolific graffiti vandals."

The databases, which are shared among the North County agencies, have helped tie separate graffiti cases around the region to the same taggers, resulting in much larger cases for prosecution. For example, deputies recently arrested one vandal in Bonsall and discovered through Graffiti Tracker that he was responsible for 23 other cases in Escondido totaling $7,000 in damage.

The program helped sheriff's deputies link graffiti in Escondido, Vista and San Marcos to one tagging crew whose four members were arrested last month. The crew caused nearly $100,000 in damage across North County, officials said.
